The Prime Minister is supposed to be a sort of unchallengeable leader. But David Cameron has made himself mincemeat of his own No.10 press chief, following the revelation that she spent three years working as a lobbyist for a Pakistani factory that makes paper used to make military uniforms. The PM has issued a grovelling apology to the House of Commons, and insisted that Iain Duncan Smith's policy on universal credit will be reviewed. He has promised to refer himself to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. But after the Prime Minister apologised for the tawdry revelation about Sarah Champion at the height of an election campaign, it is surely only a matter of time before someone demands a new inquiry, with Sir Alistair Graham as one option, into the bogus story, at a time of political controversy and low morale inside the Civil Service. After all, it is a matter of public record that, as the Minister for Women and Equalities, Mrs Champion was personally involved with this firm, leading a fact-finding mission in 2009. Mrs Champion was then pictured meeting Pakistani representatives to discuss the disputed use of recycled paper in the manufacture of uniforms for the British armed forces in that country. Mr Cameron was only with the family for a few hours in his capacity as Prime Minister and cannot be expected to have known about the senior figure in the "movement", Heather Mills, who was at the heart of it all. The affair has been condemned by all parties, although Labour maintains that only the Tories are to blame, because Mrs Champion was an adviser to Mr Duncan Smith when she was her party's Equalities Minister from 2009-11.
