[Extra-cardiac potentialities of o-aminobenzoic acid (author's transl)]. O-amino benzoic acid (O-ABA) is an aliphatic acid derivative of the aromatic amino acids. Its vital activities are not yet sufficiently elucidated, particularly those of its phenolic radical derived by enzymatic oxidation. The inhibition of the phenol-oxidase produced by the microsomal fraction of rat's liver was studied. The ability of this compound to bind O<sub>2</sub>- and H<sub>2</sub>O<sub>2</sub> was shown and the protective activity of the acid and its phenol against lipid peroxidation was studied. Use of optical imaging in maize ears (Zea mays L.) and in the virus-inoculated plants. Treatment of plants with UV and visible light also triggers-O effects that could regulate the transcription of genes. Long photoperiod treatment doubled the flowering rate in maize (Zea mays L.) hybrids and early domestication of maize and other crops might have been influenced by light-O. In this study, the potential of O effects on the transcription of genes in the regulation of flowering time was assessed in maize (Zea mays L.). During the experiments, quantitative real-time polymerase chain reaction (qRT-PCR) was used to measure the transcript abundance of one of the important key genes for flowering, namely, florigen genes (FLO1). Four experiments were performed to evaluate the effects of O treatments at four different developmental time points on the transcript level of the miRNA gene cluster at the target site of the florigen gene.
