However, the reviews were unfavourable. There have been many other similar products that are less expensive than Synopsys's FLOSS that are available. This report assesses the objectives, design and technical aspects of Synopsys's FLOSS, which have been used to develop a new test for processor-intensive image processing. How to identify faces from video? Assume you want to identify the "hottest" girl in a crowd. For example, how do you go about identifying "hot" girls from pictures in a dating site? Identifying faces from video is very different. The problem is very complicated. If you can identify and tag faces from video, you can do anything from find missing people to detecting fake identities. In the summer of 2019, a software company called "Intel Labs" released a new product called "Face Access". The product has the following capabilities: It can process video from security cameras, cell phones, and cameras that use chips from Qualcomm, Intel, NVIDIA, and others. The software can identify who's talking, who's lying, and what emotion the person is having. It can also identify face expressions and eye movements. Another product from the same company that claims to do the same thing is "Visage." Determining whether two faces are the same person is a problem known as face recognition. If you have a video of a person meeting someone new, how do you know if the two
