Economists are cautioning against the idea that exports are a panacea for all ills. On the contrary, they say, most countries with free trade agreements, like the United States, have not done so well, since they "choked on imports, particularly goods from abroad," as the great economist Gary Becker explained.

Indeed, trade has been falling at record rates in the U.S., as the U.S. has put up walls against imports. Meanwhile, trade has been rising everywhere else. No one can deny that the biggest cause of the decline in U.S. manufacturing has been our trade deficits. No one can dispute that trade deficits are directly responsible for the loss of many manufacturing jobs in the U.S. The evidence is abundant. Yet a significant share of our elected politicians would like to keep importing goods, and prevent the U.S. from having to manufacture goods, and keep or even reduce U.S. trade deficits. For example, the United States House of Representatives has voted three times over the past four years to raise tariffs, which are taxes on imported goods, to 35 percent, or even 45 percent. That is about the highest level of protection in the industrialized world. So why are they doing this? Because they know if we can make products abroad, the government has a powerful tool to raise the wages of domestic workers. At the same time, the government can reduce the amount of money flowing through the hands of employers, since there is not as much competition among foreign employers. It is worth noting that the government could accomplish all of this for free, simply by reducing or eliminating tariffs. This kind of trade policy is extremely costly. It does not serve our national interests. It leads to lower wages for workers in the United States, to higher prices for consumers and to higher interest rates, to name just a few of the costs.
