The aim of this study was to compare chemical and microbiological methods in the detection of surface contamination in laboratories processing dentures. Fieldwork took place in eight denture laboratories in one Australian city over two days in September 2012. Surface contamination was assessed using two methods, hand scraping and swabbing. Samples were collected directly from the work surface, the lamina primer, the pallet and the glove of the artisan, and on the wall. Quantitative and qualitative cultures were taken of the surface samples, while hand scrapings were taken from the artisan's hands. In addition, swabs were taken from a range of materials including surfaces and instruments. Eighty-six surface samples were taken, with most (85%) contaminated with at least one micro-organism. There was no statistically significant difference between the numbers of positive samples by two methods ($P=0.20$, chi-squared test). The cultures identified skin flora and common oral bacteria, including Streptococcus sanguis, Streptococcus milleri, Streptococcus salivarius, and Actinomyces s d0c515b9f4
