Phenotyping Complement Component 3 Variants: At the Crossroad between Disease Mechanisms and Clinical Applications. Recently, several associations of the complement component 3 (C3) gene with several immune diseases were found. We aimed to review available data regarding the clinical relevance of C3 gene variants (C3V). We performed a literature search using MEDLINE (for articles available up to December 31, 2015. Because of the close relation to C3 gene variants and the available disease markers, we investigated the potential of C3V in predicting the risk of coronary artery disease (CAD) and myocardial infarction (MI). Furthermore, we provided some insights into the pathophysiology of cardiomyopathies (CM). Although there are no clear data suggesting that genetic variations of C3 are an independent predictor of CAD or MI, associations with CAD and MI were found. A meta-analysis of case-control and
