Most food items are usually served hot or at room temperature. Most of these food items are constructed of absorbent materials such as paper and/or plastics. While the term "food" or "foodservice" is used herein, it should be understood that this is used in its broadest sense and covers any suitable food or beverage item. Certain foods can be stored in a convenient, refrigerated manner. However, this is typically not possible for some hot food items such as hamburgers and chicken. The reason is that the temperature of the food must be maintained above the freezing point or below the boiling point of water in order to prevent the food from becoming inedible or spoiled. This is especially troublesome for food items having a slow cooking process or containing solid food components such as breadcrumbs or grated cheese or mashed potatoes which tend to absorb a substantial quantity of liquid. One common solution has been to wrap hot food in a clear plastic wrap. However, this makes it difficult to view the food during the 6d1f23a050
